Source: DE19754747A The device (10) consists of a mesh with polygonal cells (16) and is made of synthetic material or a thin metal wire. The areas (22,52,54,56,60,62) where the threads (18,19,20,21) meet are fixed with tubular rivets (28). First the threads (18,19,20,21) are joined in order to form a specific shape (12) like the inside of the gullet, wound around the cylindrical shaft (30) of the rivet (28) and then permanently fixed. The individual cells (16) of the mesh should be ideally wider at both ends (13,14) of the device and narrow in the middle to give maximum support. An independent claim for a method of manufacturing the stent is included.

Source: EP1036550A The support device comprises a metal wire meshing (2,4), which can be expanded in a radial direction. The meshing has several projecting elements (10,12) on at least one axial end. The projecting elements are rod shaped, project in the axial direction, and extend the meshing. The elements have a thickening at their outer ends.

Source: WO9830172A The invention concerns an expandable tubular device consisting of an assembly of radially expandable cylindrical elements, aligned along a common longitudinal axis and connected two by two successively by a plurality of connecting members spaced at an angle and coplanar with said cylindrical elements. The invention is characterised in that these connecting members (3) are capable of being elongated along the longitudinal axis to compensate the reduction in length of the cylindrical elements (2) when they expand radially; each connecting member (3) forming an undulation consisting of at least three elementary U-shaped portions mutually connected two by two successively in the opposite direction, and the free ends of which (3a, 3b) are respectively connected to two adjacent cylindrical elements (2). The invention is applicable to corporeal ducts and in particular to blood vessels with stenosis.
